1. The communication process and its purpose

Communication is the process of transmitting a message from a sender to a receiver, with the intention of it being understood as intended. The basic process: sender → encodes a message → transmits it through a chosen channel → receiver decodes the message → feedback returns to the sender confirming (or not) that the message was understood correctly. In business, communication serves several purposes: informing, instructing, persuading, motivating and building relationships between an organisation and its various stakeholders.

Sample of the practice examination (Question One of Five)

Note on format. The full paper includes a complete practice examination laid out the way a real KASNEB CPA paper is laid out — timed, five compulsory 20-mark questions — so you can rehearse the exact exam format before sitting the real thing. This is an original practice paper, not a reproduction of any actual KASNEB past paper.
